

I simply cannot believe anybody is even considering allowing further consolidation of media ownership. I'd argue here that a diverse and competitive media environment is necessary for a democratic society, but I guess the whole notion of a democratic society has been thrown out in favor of increased corporate profits. The fact this is even being thought about instead of what's needed, a severe rolling back of the media monopolies and the de-regulation that has created the current state of affairs, tells me that the good of the nation and it's citizens have long ago been relegated to use as toilet paper in washington.
